The Cascata delle Marmore is a waterfall that is located about 7.5 km away from Terni, in Umbria, almost at the end of the Valnerina, the long valley carved by the Nera river. It is a waterfall with controlled flow, among the highest in Europe, being able to count on a total drop of 165 m, divided into three jumps, inserted in a large natural park. The name derives from the calcium carbonate salts present on the rocks that are similar to white marble.

During the excursion lunch will be included.

4. Pozzo di San Patrizio – 23.06.2020 - € 50,00

The historic San Patrizio well is a structure built by Antonio da Sangallo the Younger in Orvieto, between 1527 and 1537, at the behest of Pope Clement VII, fresh from the Sack of Rome and eager to protect himself in case of siege of the city in which he had retired. The work on the well - designed to supply water in the event of a disaster or siege - was completed during the papacy of Paolo III Farnese (1534-1549). Access to the well, a masterpiece of engineering, is guaranteed by two one-way helical ramps, completely autonomous and served by two different doors, which allowed them to transport the extracted water without obstructing it and without having to resort to the only that went up to the village from the valley floor. The well, 54 meters deep, [1] was built by digging in the tuff of the plateau on which Orvieto stands, a stone quite hard, but which is suffering, after several centuries, from the sewage discharges. It has a cylindrical shape with a circular base with a diameter of 13 m. The stairs are 248, and the large windows that give light to you are 70. Perhaps because of the aura of sacred and magic that accompanies deep cavities, or by pure imitation of cinematographic models, modern tourists throw coins in them hoping to return. The well took the name of St. Patrick, probably, because it was used as a place of expiation of sins in the same way as a cave, existing in Ireland called "Purgatorio di San Patrizio".

During the excursion lunch will be included.
